A Father's Desperate Search

In the summer of 2014, a father named Abdul-Rahman Kassig received a phone call that would change his life forever. His two daughters, Ruqayya and Hoda, had left their home in suburban Virginia and traveled to Syria to join the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

Abdul-Rahman was devastated. He couldn't believe that his daughters, whom he had raised in a loving and supportive home, would become radicalized and join a terrorist organization. He knew that he had to do everything in his power to bring them back.

Abdul-Rahman's search for his daughters took him on a harrowing journey through the war-torn Middle East. He traveled to Turkey, Jordan, and Iraq, meeting with government officials, aid workers, and members of the Syrian opposition. He faced danger at every turn, but he refused to give up hope.

Along the way, Abdul-Rahman learned more about the process of radicalization and the allure that ISIS held for young Muslims. He discovered that his daughters had been drawn to the group's message of Islamic extremism and its promise of a utopian society.

Despite the dangers, Abdul-Rahman never gave up hope of finding his daughters. He persisted in his search for months, tirelessly following every lead and never losing faith that he would bring them back.
